

Roger Williams and Jane Whalley precipitately fell in love. But the path of young love ran anything but smoothly. Williams, as confessed in a letter, had fears both of Jane's temper and her piety! Gossip soon circulated of his sudden infatuation, and Lady Barrington warned him that it gave her no pleasure. "I have hearkened after your Ladiship's mind," Williams informed her. "Your Ladiship may wonder at this unwonted absence and also aske what meanes this paper deputie! Give me leave (deare Madam) to say with David, to his brothers in the field: is there not a cause? . . . Many and often speeches have long fluttered or floune abroad concerning your Ladiships neere kinswoman and my unworthy selfe." For a time he had endeavored to hold himself aloof, in deference to Lady Barrington's request. "Yet like a roylng snow-ball or some flowing streame the report extends and gathers stronger. . . ." Unable to conquer his attachment, he obtained "good Testimonials" about Jane's "Godlines." She had been "much accused for passionate and hastie, rash and unconstant . . ."; but he desired to marry her, and Lady Elizabeth and Sir William had advised him "to open" to Lady Joan "the whole Anatomie of this business."

He had qualms on the point of social rank, "it being some Indecorum," he wrote, for Jane "to condescend to my low Ebb there I somewhat stick; but were all this cleared, there is one barr not likely to be broken and that is the present Estate of us both." Jane Whalley, he had heard, was not to receive her inheritance at any time in the near future and possibly her portion "as things stand now in England shall never be by us enjoyed." Nor was he sanguine about his own prospects. A "tender conscience . . . hath kept me back from honour and preferment Besides many former offers and that late New England call, I have since had 2 severall livings proffered to me each of them £100 per annum. . . ." If he remained at Otes as he desired, he could hope for little beyond his small income as chaplain. After the death of his "aged loving mother" he expected—"though for the present she be close and will not promise"!—a humble inheritance of twenty pounds a year. Williams added with pride, he had "a little (yet costlie) studie of books."

Poor as he was, Williams gravely assured her Ladyship, he had prospects of marriage elsewhere, one offer at the moment in hand, "person and present portion worthy." But he hoped that the Lord would smile on his suit for Jane Whalley.

Women's Judiciary Committee

Through its activities in dealing out punishments to those girls who infringe upon the rules and regulations set down by the Women's Student Council, the Women's Judiciary Committee maintains respect among the women students for these rules. Justice and impartiality are the keystones of its decisions.

The Committee is guided in its activities by the Dean of Women and the president of the Women's Student Council. Meetings are held whenever misdemeanors arise and punishments are meted out according to the seriousness of the offense.
